JeanetteA case of heart failure with preserved ejection fraction in the first trimester of pregnancy. Heart failure is characterized by a diminished cardiac output and is associated with high cardiovascular morbidity and mortality. Over the last 3 years, we have experienced a number of heart failure cases associated with pregnancy and postpartum. The first case of heart failure with preserved ejection fraction (HFPEF) in the first trimester of pregnancy was diagnosed at 19 + 5 weeks of gestation, and the pregnancy was continued to term. She had no a prior history of heart failure or suspected heart disease, and was diagnosed as having hypertension as the main problem. The case showed a marked improvement of heart failure in the postpartum period. HFPEF is often associated with various cardiovascular and noncardiovascular diseases; however, few cases of HFPEF associated with pregnancy have been reported. Cardiac failure in the first trimester is rare, but should be considered in pregnant women with clinical manifestations such as systolic or diastolic murmurs, and bradycardia.2016 Year Of The Sovereign - The 3rd Edition About the Author Neil Portnow Neil Portnow is an author, motivational speaker, and co-founder of Freegrace Productions, Inc.
